Systematic Reviews Training and PhD cohort building reception

PhD candidates within the School of Public health came together in April to socialise and meet fellow students from other departments after a well-attended Systematic Review training session delivered by Dr. Nathan Green. The event is the first of a wider calendar of events organised by the School’s student reps that are geared towards increasing discussion and networking between the many departments within the School of Public Health.

Over 40 students came for a range of nibbles and drinks, with students from 6 departments represented. The event continued into the evening with some students carrying on discussions in a nearby watering hole. The feedback from the students was incredibly positive, with many individuals specifically mentioning how nice it is to hear about fellow PhD students’ work from other departments and even a couple of people mentioning potential collaborations.

We are grateful to the Cohort Building for providing funding for this event. We hope that this event, combined with our future events will continue to grow a sense of community amongst the Schools’ PhD students.
