

3 things business leaders need to know about meetings in a hybrid world

Written by

Sankalp Chaturvedi

Published

27 October 2021

Category

Strategy & Leadership

Key topics

Digital Transformation, Leadership, Networking

How do we ensure effective collaboration in a digitally transformed world? Professor Sankalp Chaturvedi outlines three core principles for business leaders to consider

The business world was already changing pre-pandemic, with digital working in the US growing by 159 per cent since 2005. Then came coronavirus (COVID-19), and seven or eight years of digital transformation were condensed into one. The pandemic has changed our world, and some changes will stay long term.

Virtually overnight companies have had to adapt to a new and often unfamiliar way of working, and they have done so, with meetings migrating online, teams working together in a virtual space and many other aspects of business changing too. There's a sense that we have all become more efficient as we cram multiple meetings into an even longer working day. But is this an illusion of efficiency?

Meetings need structure to ensure they don't become a waste of time.
This becomes even more important in the hybrid world

Team meetings are central to much informed decision-making. But even pre-pandemic there was a concern that for many people, meetings were often pointless, a waste of time (and money), and to be avoided at all costs. Doodle has analysed the meetings that took place using its scheduling tools over the last few years, and found that – of the 19 million meetings held across the US, Germany, Switzerland and the UK in 2019 – two thirds were considered pointless by those involved, costing a staggering \$541bn.

The future remains unpredictable, but most companies are considering a hybrid of physical and virtual working, tapping into the benefits of technology, and offering more flexibility for leaders and employees alike. This impacts not only on meetings but on the central role of teamwork and collaboration.

So, in this new hybrid world of flexi-working, with a mix of face-to-face and virtual meetings, what do business leaders need to consider in terms of their role going forwards? How will they adapt?

I believe leaders need to home in on three core principles.

A hybrid world requires empathy

Never before have leaders needed to be so adaptable and flexible. The ability to empathise and to build and manage relationships in the real world can be hard enough. But in the virtual world, when so many of the cues we need to read are limited by a Zoom or Teams screen, it's that much harder.

Virtual charisma requires dialled-up energy levels, clear and simple messages, and a skillset more akin to actors

Empathising virtually will be one of the biggest challenges in this transformed world. We can't read body language as easily, we can't demonstrate that we are looking directly at someone and actively listening, and we can't easily tell when someone else has disengaged or is distracted by something in their own surroundings. Virtual charisma requires dialled-up energy levels, clear and simple messages, and a skillset more akin to actors engaging effectively with a virtual TV or cinema audience.

Digital transformation also makes room for more unintentional biases to creep in. Leaders therefore need to work even harder to allow individuals to disagree without being disagreeable, to ensure that the extroverts don't loom large over the introverts, and to create a safe space for the best ideas to shine rather than those that are simply well-articulated or promoted most loudly.

We need to rethink how we collaborate

Efficient businesses rely on strong teamwork, but the pandemic and this new hybrid world have forced us to build virtual teams. New staff have often had to build exclusively online relationships as they get their feet under a virtual table. There are still many unknowns and much anxiety.

Companies are all creating their own new normal, some allowing more flexibility than others. Leaders will need to think how best to protect long-term relationships with their employees, motivating and supporting without the intangible benefits of physical proximity: the chats at the water cooler, the impromptu catchups, the social drink after work.

Investing in getting teamwork and meetings right will be the biggest challenge with the greatest rewards

It will be necessary for all leaders to rethink how teamwork can adapt within their own business, thus creating a new version of teamwork and replacing the pointless with the positive.

Attention is limited and time is scarce

Meetings, whether physical or virtual, need structure to ensure they don't become a waste of everyone's time. This becomes even more important in the hybrid world. Attention dissipates quickly on-screen.

Before a meeting is even organised, consideration must be given to its purpose, who needs to be involved, if leaders have the skills required, and whether there is a better way to approach it.

Participants must prepare and come ready to contribute. The agenda must be short and specific. The purpose of the meeting must be clearly defined, and must have an end goal so that all involved leave feeling that it has been successful.

We face a constantly changing future, so adaptability and flexibility must be the watchwords of any future leader. Meetings and teamwork are central to business success; investing in getting them right in this new hybrid world will be the biggest challenge with the greatest rewards.

We're in this together, whether physically or virtually, and we must plan to be future ready, for everyone's benefit.

Written by

Sankalp Chaturvedi

Published

27 October 2021

Category

Strategy & Leadership

Key topics

Digital Transformation, Leadership, Networking

Share

About Sankalp Chaturvedi

Associate Dean (People and Culture) - Professor of Organisational Behaviour & Leadership

Professor Chaturvedi is Professor of Organisational Behaviour & Leadership and Associate Dean of Equity, Diversity & Inclusion at Imperial Business School. He also leads the Gandhi Centre for Inclusive Innovation.

He holds a PhD from the NUS Business School, National University of Singapore, and previously completed a Master's in Human Resource Development & Management from the Indian Institute of Technology.

Professor Chaturvedi's research focusses on effective leadership, mindfulness, and collaboration mechanisms in teams, and he has published articles in the Journal of Applied Psychology, Organizational Behavior & Human Decision Processes, Strategic Management Journal, Leadership Quarterly and Journal of Management, among others.

Read Sankalp's Imperial Profile for more information and publications.

Monthly newsletter

Receive the latest insights from Imperial Business School

Sign up now

Leadership: a definition

To develop your leadership, you will need to look honestly at your personal weaknesses and strengths, and address them in a way that's authentic with what you want to achieve. Authenticity should be reflected in your behaviour, consistently

Read more

Are ethical leaders good for business?

Ethical leaders don't have to be high up within an organisation, but they do have to show responsibility for their skills, ideas and thinking, and promote positivity.

Read more

Seven minutes of mindfulness makes you a better colleague

Practising seven minutes of mindfulness at work can reduce stress for your employees and boost generosity between them.

Read more